What happened?!

DEPARTURE: Sundsgapet anchorage, Norway

Wind: 25-30 knots NW

Sea state: 1.5 - 2 metres

Sails: goosewing, three reefs in the mainsail

Door: none, the cockpit is dry

North Sea

Situation 24 hours later:

E V E R Y T H I N G   I S   W E T   O

after a freak wave hits the ship flooding our habitat with at least 100 litres of water

Location: off the northern tip of Denmark

Time to destination: 21 hours to the emergency stop on the coast of Sweden, then 5 hours to Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark

After bailing out most of the water underway, we have to wait till arriving in the marina to continue with rinsing clothes, sleeping bags, cushions and everything else. Christophe unscrews the floor boards only to find more seawater to deal with. A great weather window to sail to Denmark pushes us to move out of the realm of marina advantages (access to unlimited fresh water, washing machines and dryers) a day too soon – even though free of salt, the things are still wet and the boat one big mess. At least our anchorage in Copenhagen welcomes us with plenty of sunshine and breeze – just what the doctor ordered!

The spices and other food, after floating in seawater, are safe from damage, so is the computer and, except for one radio, all electronics

RINSE, DRY, ARRANGE - salvaged watercolours and paper remind me that I haven't painted anything for ages

WATERPROOFING the cockpit lockers with closed-cell foam tiles used for gym flooring

Christophe needs special glue to finish the job, so we leave "the office" to venture 6 kilometres to the closest nautical shop. This is when we realise that walking in COPENHAGEN is all about the journey, not the destination

Watch out for bicycles

62 % of Copenhageners cycle to work, school or university, which makes nearly 900 000 bicycles out and about during the rush hour

Surprising variety of sculptures slows us down to admire the works of Danish artists

Huge parks connect different parts of town

The Danes know how to appreciate their green spaces. We blend in with our picnic lunch perfectly donate or collect items for free

Despite all odds, we make it to the nautical shop and Christophe can finish working on the cockpit lockers. We feel sorry to leave Copenhagen so soon but the forecast promises us following winds and L'Envol is ready to sail onto the BALTIC SEA
